On the corner of Atlanta and Anderson Streets in downtown Marietta, Georgia, The Marietta/Cobb Museum of Art is housed in the vintage 1909 post office building. The museum features its own collection of 19th and 20th century artists as well as traveling shows sponsored by many of the famous art museum throughout America. Some of these shows have been incredibly popular, and the museum is gaining a reputation in north Georgia for these exhibitions.

History of the Museum

The building has been home to both the Marietta Post Office and the city library over the last 90 years. Completed in 1909 under the direction of then postmaster DeWitt Cole, the building would be the center of life in the (then) small north Georgia town at the southern end of the Appalachian Mountains. The building was considered "state-of-the-art" because it had steam heat, electric lights and running water. By 1963 the post office had outgrown its environs and moved to a new building. The Clarke Library occupied the building after an extensive remodeling.

Over the next 26 years the library grew in its new home. During its stay the library grows to more than 33,000 books and in 1989 the decision was made to move.

Visionary Marietta residents saved the building from destruction.

If you haven't got your tickets yet or need to buy more please make sure you are at the meeting on time because once we stop selling the tickets that will be it.
